BARBARA'S UNCLE.

ARBARA sat in her little room, busy with her sewing machine. Around her were great piles of vests, which she had just figi-hed. Though the room was so small; the sunlight came in and tinged everything with its golden light. Indeed, the sun is no respector of persons, and steps as freely into the dwellings of the poor, as into the mansions of the rich.

The young girl paused in her work to listen to the song of a robbin under her win-dow; then she began to sing to herself in a care free, happy way. Just then she heard an old body hobbling up at her door. Barbara went to open it. An aged man stood before her - ninety he might have been, to judge by his withered face.

"Is this Barbara Henrich?" he asked in piping voice. "Yes," said Barbara, smiling. "Come

The old man put his hand to his car, as if quite unable to eatch a word. "Come in," she shouted ; and he followed her into the room.

"I'm your Uncle Jacob," he screamed, as if she were as deaf as himself-"your mother's only brother; and I have come to find "Ay. ay," said Barbara, with whom the love of kindred was very strong.

The longer she gazed into his face, the more she saw the look of her mother .-There was the same kind smile, the same merry glance in the twinkling, gray eyes .-So she fell to hand-shaking in her hearty German fashion; then came the tears, and it all ended by throwing her arms around his neck and kissing him.

A short time afterward, Barbara began to at the table for to talk with her old was impossible. Just as she had finished. centre dish, up the stairs came her brothers, Conrad and Joe. They were much the worse for lager, as they usually were at night, and when they saw a decrepit old man sitting at their table, they were anything but

"It's our Uncle Jacob," said Barbara softly, "come to us from Germany-our dear mother's only brother. I wish he wasn't so deaf. I so want to talk with him."

A moment afterward, as Conrad and Joe began to swear, she was glad that he could not bear them. Barbara gave the old man her bed ; then she sat down to do a little extra word, that she might buy comforts for him. At length she lay down upon a hard couch, but sleep soon came, for she was young and healthy. Next morning, Uncle

Jacob was too ill to rise.
"Send the old body to the poor-house," tions.

"Indeed he shall not go," said Barbara, with spirit; our mother loved him too well for that. Don't you remember how she used to talk about him? He was her only brothfor him. Just see how like mother he looks -as she did in her very last sickness."

The young men answered her roughly, and, putting on their boots, stalked out of the room. Barbara bathed the old man's head, and with a few soft touches about the pillow, that love alone can give, she went back to her work. That night the brothers came home more drunk than usual-to pick up their things and start for the West, they said : "You'd better go with us, Barbara. We are going to make money like dirt; and as to staying here and supporting an old pauper, we will not do it." "No. indeed, I will not leave him," said Barbara. But when she saw them going down stairs with their satchels on their arms, the love of kindred, which was so strong in her heart, made her follow them. "Let us shake hands," she said, softly, "we may never meet sgain;" and, rough as they were. they returned her warm kiss, and said , "God bless you," ere they departed.

When they were gone, Barbara went back to her room and cried as if her heart would break. In the midst of her weeping, there was a well-known foot-fall on the stairs, and in a minute more, her friend Fred Heiberger, was beside ber. "Don't fret," said the young man, kindly.

taking her hand in his; "you'll got along better without Canrad and Joe." "I couldn't turn away my mother's brother," said Barbara, sobbing.

"No, indeed; you're a brave girl, and you've done right." Then he began to tell her about a little baker's shop that was that day vacant and could be had for two hundred dollars a year. There were two rooms above with a sunny

"Yes," said Fred, "there's a risk. But it was such a good stand, and my heart ran away with me. I said to myself, that I would make good bread, and give honest weight, and perhaps have a penny for the poor and needy.

Barbara's face brightened as he spoke, but she answered,-"It will all come right in time-let us work and wait." "Perhaps so," said Fred, with a sigh. Barbara resolved to sew harder than ever, so that, besides supporting her aged uncle, she might now and then lay up a penny. The next day, Uncle Jacob requested his little valise to be brought to him, and spent CURIOUS PETRIFACTION -- More than twenty years ago Judge Almy sunk a well at Bolinas. Happening to have three or four oak oil casks at the time, he knocked in the heads, burned out the oil and set them in the well, one above the other, and strange to say, they all turned to solid stone, and are as perfect to-day as when they were put in the well. The top cark is about two feet below the surface, and a curb of common boards is set over the well, running down to meet the casks. Several of these curbs have rotted away and been replaced, but the cak casks appear likely to stand forever. Is there here a hint for well builders, or are causes of petrifaction local?
